

TMHills ANM 2017

Transition Malvern Hills (TMHills) has continued, throughout the year, to engage in the local and national projects to promote sustainable living. This is part of the efforts of many grass-root groups that are reacting to the challenges that we all face from the effects of global warming. Within Malvern Hills the transition group has been working for 10 years and continues to support local initiatives that have grown from its roots. In the early days TMHills concentrated on making people aware of global warming and how it would affect our everyday living. We are now at a stage when global warming is mentioned in the media on a daily basis. While this has led to many individuals, communities, businesses, countries around the globe embracing this challenge by putting into place, low carbon sustainable enterprises, and celebrating new technology that supports low carbon living, we, here in Britain, have a government that is stalling over their promise to be world leaders in tackling the problem. It is therefore, once again, important for individuals to support and promote low carbon developments and ideas that are coming from advocates who continue to invest their time in coming up with solutions that can offer answers, advice and guidance. This is where I now see us, as part of the transition movement, putting our energies. Thank you to Jon Halle for coming along tonight to inspire us to continue to move forward, and show us what is attainable, also thanks to the Centre of Alternative Energy for their longstanding commitment of raising awareness, coming up with solutions and creating the Zero Carbon Britain (3) document, to be presented to our government, that shows the pathways that can be taken to tackle this global issue. I must thank the core TMH group that have continued their hard work throughout the year. We also celebrate the sustainable iconic initiatives that have grown and developed, here in Malvern, over the last 10 years. Thank you all for turning up tonight.
